the conventional wisdom in political science is that for a democracy to be consolidated all groups must have a chance to attain power if they do not then they will subvert democracy and choose to fight for power in this paper we show that this wisdom is seriously incomplete because it considers absolute not relative payoffs although the probability of winning an election increases with the size of a group so does the probability of winning a fight thus in a situation where all groups have a high chance of winning an election they may also have a high chance of winning a fight indeed in a natural model we show that democracy may never be consolidated in such a situation rather democracy may only be stable when one group is dominant we provide a test of a key aspect of our model using data from la violencia a political conflict in colombia during the years 1946 1950 between the liberal and conservative parties consistent with our results and contrary to the conventional wisdom we show that fighting between the parties was more intense in municipalities where the support of the parties was more evenly balanced
