seminar paper from the year 2013 in the subject business economics business management corporate governance grade 13 university of applied sciences nürnberg iom course mba language english abstract the scientific field of leadership behavior is well researched but there are no homogenous statements about what a leader really defines with the help of studies scientists could identify different leadership behavior types and their influence on subordinates task oriented leaders are goal focused and do never lose track of the target even if the staff is unsatisfied with the situation relations oriented leaders try everything to create comfortable work circumstances for their subordinates they believe that satisfied employees generate a higher productivity the third major type of leadership behavior is the change oriented which is to be found in dynamic industry sectors such as the technological industry this type of leaders should be open for change and should motivate their employees with new ideas another question is if leaders are born to become leaders or if people can develop to become a good leader however both assumptions are right leaders should have inborn distal traits like a strong personality but also proximal traits like social skills and a good problem solving ability which can be developed and learned summing up there exist different leadership behavior styles and leaders should know about the behavior types because the use of the different types depends on the actual situation the second part of the work paper tries to analyze the specific traits and skills of sales leaders the results are that sales leaders have to have strong proximal traits like social and emotional skills as the targets are already identified they have to be relations oriented to win the subordinates working for the mission the leading type also depends on the given situation if the leader has a good relationship to his representatives he can be more task oriented to reach a higher level of productivity but if he has a weak relationship to his reps he should be more relations oriented to win their trust as the short enumeration shows there exists no right way to lead rather every situation asks for its own leadership type
